

The Wife of the Pretender to the Throne of France

LOUIS PHILIPPE, paternal grandfather of the Duchesse de Guise, was the last King of France. On one occasion the young Queen Victoria, with her Prince Consort and a large train of attendants, was entertained by the French King at his historic Chateau d'Eu. Her royal yacht, met by Louis Philippe and his entire court, was greeted with a thundering salute of guns. The royal party, in gilded carriages and escorted by gaily caparisoned guards, moved in an imposing cortege to the nearby Chateau d'Eu.

CHATEAU D'EU, domain of the Guise family through many generations is the birthplace of the Duchesse. It is a sixteenth century restoration, but traces still remain of the original fortress built in 912.

ISABELLE, Duchesse de Guise—the illustrious name breathes romance! And provokes a chain of fascinating thoughts—France under the kings! Brilliant courts, balls, hunts—brocades, powdered wigs and beauty patches!

For all that France is a Republic, the Duchesse has been surrounded throughout her life by the glamour of royalty. Philippe VII, Bourbon Pretender exiled in England, was her father.

Philippe VIII, next in line, was her brother. The present much-loved Head of the House of France—known to the Royalists as "King"—and to Republicans as "Pretender to the Throne"—is her husband.

No less popular than her royal husband is the Duchesse de Guise and no less ambitious! Her royal aspirations have frequently been expressed to her Royalist adherents.

And those who know her, recognize the great determination and strength of will in her quiet declarations.

A MOST CHARMING queen she will be if ever the Duchesse realizes her ambitions. Tall, beautiful and exceedingly gracious, she would undoubtedly be as popular as any queen that France has ever known.

The Duchesse is thoroughly French and except for the years of her father's exile which she spent in England, has lived in Paris most of her life.

Now, though her husband, as head of the Royal House, is exiled from France, the Duchesse de Guise may come and go at pleasure.

THE CHATEAU D'ANJOU in Belgium, residence of the exiled Pretender to the Throne of France and his family. The name calls to mind the first Duc d'Anjou, founder of the House of Bourbon in France, born in 1602. Chateau d'Anjou, because of its location in Belgium, is a favorite retreat of the Duchesse and her husband, the present Head of the House of France.

With infinite tact she has built up a large following among the aristocrats, and has done much to further her husband's aspirations to the throne.

Of high position and high ambitions, the Duchesse de Guise knows well the power of beauty. It increases every woman's influence. And absolutely essential to beauty is a good complexion.

The Duchesse wisely uses Pond's Two Creams, to guard and protect her lovely skin. Learn what she has to say:

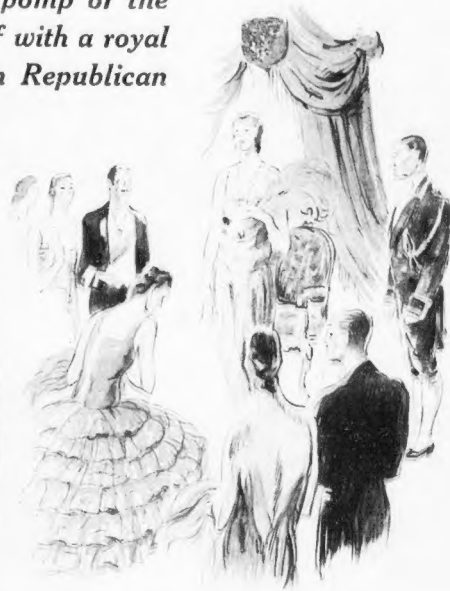

"Every Frenchwoman," she declares, "instinctively delights in the art and wisdom of cultivating beauty."

"If she happens to come from a family whose glamorous days the world remembers with a thrill, she is doubly zealous in performing all those little rites which keep her loveliest."

"I am delighted to find Pond's Two Creams. They have met the needs of my complexion perfectly. Delicate and delicious, they keep the skin fresh and vigorous."

Pond's Cold Cream should be used always upon retiring and several times during the day to cleanse the skin. Pat it generously over the face and neck and let it remain for a few minutes. Its fine, pure oils will penetrate to the depths of the pores, softening and lifting out the accumulation of dust and powder. Wipe off, use a bit of fresh cream to remove the last trace of dirt.

The Duchesse de Guise, daughter of Philippe VII—sister of the late Philippe VIII—wife of the present Head of the House of France, maintains the pomp of the ancient Bourbons, surrounds herself with a royal court in Republican France.

ISABELLE, DUCHESSE DE GUISE, descendant of the Kings of France. Married to the Present Head of the Bourbon House in France, her beauty and her charming tact have done much to further the Royalist cause in France. Both in France and when sharing her husband's exile, she receives with all the formality of the court of a crowned queen.

evening or before you go out, brush Pond's Vanishing Cream lightly over your skin. It adds an exquisite radiance, takes your powder evenly, holds it for hours on end. And when you go out of doors, no matter how delicate your skin may be, it gives unflinching protection from wind and frosty air.
